Take a look the chart lower chart above. It's a noisy one, looking like one of those "Rorschach" psychology tests turned sideways. Don't be intimidated by it. For now, just focus on the red bars in the lower half of the chart. Those are the Net Commercial positions; that is, the number of short contracts minus the number of long contracts. Use the scale on the left hand side. Notice how they are always net short because they are constantly moving producer bullion into the end user market. The net short positions tend to grow as the gold prices rises and they tend to fall when the prices come down.

Now notice where I have drawn two circles to the left. These are the only two times in the past year when the number of Net Commercial contracts dropped to as low as 80,000; last October and once again in January. Sure enough, check the Gold price chart above and see how these lows in the COT data also coincide with important lows in the gold price itself.

Changes in just this past week indicate we are at or very near a cyclical low. As of June 19th this number was sitting at roughly 114,000 well down from the April highs of around 160,000. Well, don't look now, but this past week the Net Commercials dropped to 83,000, all but a Buy signal!
